

Justice Department Issues McNulty Memorandum

On December 12, 2006, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty formally announced that the Department of Justice ("DOJ") was revising its policy regarding federal prosecution of business organizations, superseding the now-infamous "Thompson Memorandum," which was named after former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson.<sup>1</sup> In the resulting "McNulty Memorandum," the DOJ primarily revised its policy in two areas of recent controversy: requests for waiver of attorney-client privilege and work product protections from companies seeking leniency from the government, and the advancement of fees to company employees in criminal investigations and prosecutions. To understand these topics fully, it is useful to examine the McNulty Memorandum's two predecessor policies.

Previous Policy

In 1999, at the insistence of defense lawyers and corporations who complained that there was no uniformity in the exercise of prosecutorial discretion, the DOJ announced its first corporate charging policy. Issued by then-Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder, Jr., and titled "Federal Prosecution of Corporations," the policy became known as the "Holder Memorandum."<sup>2</sup> The Holder Memorandum stressed that: "Corporations should not be treated leniently because of their artificial nature nor should they be subject to harsher treatment." It set out a variety of factors for prosecutors to consider when making corporate charging decisions, and it introduced the connection between cooperation and the potential waiver of attorney-client privilege and work product protection that has since proven unpopular and controversial.

The superseding Thompson Memorandum was issued in January 2003, in the wake of the corporate fraud scandals that began in 2001.<sup>3</sup> It changed the Holder principles in two primary ways. First, whereas the Holder Memorandum arguably was merely advisory, the Thompson Memorandum more plainly required that prosecutors apply its principles in every case where a company might be criminally liable. Second, the Thompson Memorandum stressed that prosecutors must scrutinize more carefully the nature of corporate compliance programs and efforts at cooperation. While declaring that business entities would be charged only in a minority of cases, the Thompson Memorandum emphasized that "[t]oo often business organizations, while purporting to cooperate with a DOJ investigation, in fact take steps to impede the quick and effective exposure of the complete scope of wrongdoing under investigation." Compliance programs, moreover, needed to be "truly effective," and not "mere paper programs."

---

<sup>1</sup> Memorandum from Paul J. McNulty, Deputy Att'y Gen., U.S. Dep't of Justice (Dec. 12, 2006), available at http://www.usdoj.gov/dag/speech/2006/mcnulty\_memo.pdf.

<sup>2</sup> Memorandum from Eric Holder, Jr., Deputy Att'y Gen., U.S. Dep't of Justice (June 16, 1999), available at <http://www.usdoj.gov/criminal/fraud/policy/Chargingcorps.html>.

<sup>3</sup> Memorandum from Larry D. Thompson, Deputy Att'y Gen., U.S. Dep't of Justice (Jan. 20, 2003), available at http://www.usdoj.gov/dag/cftf/business\_organizations.pdf.

JANUARY 2007

The goal of the Thompson Memorandum was to persuade companies to cooperate with a DOJ investigation as fully as they were able, in an effort to root out wrongdoing, promote self-policing, and encourage high standards of corporate ethics. The carrot at the end of the stick was the possibility that the government would agree not to prosecute the company or to defer prosecution for a specified time period, after which charges would be dismissed. Indeed, in the five years since the corporate fraud scandals began, only a small number of companies have been charged criminally by the Justice Department.

Criticism of the Thompson Memorandum

The criticism of the Thompson Memorandum focused on its most important directive, practically speaking, regarding the charging decision: consideration of the extent of a company's cooperation. Although the primary means of cooperation typically consists of making employees and officers available to be interviewed and otherwise providing information, the Thompson Memorandum also directed prosecutors to take into account, among other things, whether the company had supported "culpable" employees by entering into joint defense agreements or by advancing attorneys' fees, unless the payment of such fees was required by law or the corporate charter or by-laws. And, of course, the policy allowed prosecutors to consider the company's willingness to waive attorney-client privilege and work product protection.

Attacks on the waiver policy had been loud and consistent since even before the Thompson Memorandum was promulgated. In May 2000, for example, the Association of Corporate Counsel ("ACC") complained to DOJ that ACC's "members indicate that it is the regular practice of U.S. Attorneys to require corporations to waive their attorney-client privileges and divulge confidential conversations and documents in order to prove cooperation with a prosecutor's investigation."<sup>4</sup> More recently, a coalition of former DOJ officials, including three former Attorneys General and three former Deputy Attorneys General, have sharply criticized the waiver policy.<sup>5</sup>

The legal fee provisions garnered their strongest criticism from the judge presiding over the KPMG tax shelter prosecution in New York. In United States v. Stein, 435 F. Supp. 2d 330 (S.D.N.Y. 2006), Judge Lewis A. Kaplan held that the government's taking the payment of legal fees into consideration in deciding whether to charge a company may effect a denial of an individual defendant's Fifth Amendment right to a fair trial and Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The Stein court explicitly condemned the Thompson Memorandum on this issue: "The Thompson Memorandum and the [government] pressure on KPMG to deny or cut off defendants' attorneys' fees necessarily impinge upon the KPMG Defendants' ability to defend themselves."

Based on these and many other voices, the Senate was poised at the time the McNulty Memorandum was issued to consider legislation severely curtailing the government's practices with respect to attorney-client privilege, work product protection, joint defense agreements, and the advancement of legal fees.<sup>6</sup>

Changes Under McNulty

While reciting the same general set of factors relevant to a corporate charging decision that were cited by the Thompson Memorandum, the McNulty Memorandum limits the authority of prosecutors in the privilege waiver and attorney fee areas. Under McNulty, "[w]aiver of attorney-client and work product protections is not a prerequisite to a finding that a company has cooperated in the government's investigation." Indeed, even requests for waiver are now only authorized if "there is a legitimate need for the privileged information" in order for the government to fulfill its law enforcement obligations. Such need may be demonstrated by the following factors:

---

<sup>4</sup> Letter from Maud Mater, Executive Vice President, Gen. Counsel, and Sec'y, Am. Corporate Counsel Ass'n to Eric Holder, Deputy Att'y Gen., U.S. Dep't of Justice (May 12, 2000), available at <http://www.acca.com/public/accapolicy/holder.html>.

<sup>5</sup> See Letter to Hon. Alberto R. Gonzales (Sept. 5, 2006), available at <http://www.acca.com/public/attyclientpriv/agsept52006.pdf>.

<sup>6</sup> Jason McClure, Specter Bill Seeks to Alter DOJ Corporate Fraud Investigations, LEGALTIMES.COM, Dec. 8, 2006, available at <http://www.law.com/jsp/dc/PubArticleDC.jsp?id=1165501512030&hub=TopStories> (last accessed Dec. 17, 2006).

- (1) the likelihood and degree to which the privileged information will benefit the government's investigation;
- (2) whether the information sought can be obtained in a timely and complete fashion by using alternative means that do not require waiver;
- (3) the completeness of the voluntary disclosure already provided; and
- (4) the collateral consequences to a corporation of a waiver.

Notably, even if application of these somewhat vague factors establishes a legitimate need for waiver, prosecutors must comply with strict approval and consultation requirements that did not exist previously. First, before requesting a waiver of even "purely factual information" — called "Category I" information and "which may or may not be" covered by a privilege — line prosecutors must obtain the approval in writing of the United States Attorney, who in turn must furnish a copy to, and first consult with, the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division. Significantly, however, a company's response to the government's request for a waiver of privilege for Category I information "may be considered in determining whether a corporation has cooperated in the government's investigation." Typical items that would fall into Category I would be memoranda of factual interviews with witnesses in an internal investigation.

A request for "Category II" information — such as communications involving legal advice or non-factual attorney work product — must be approved in writing by the Deputy Attorney General, and may only be sought in "rare circumstances." A company's rejection of a request for Category II information may not be considered by prosecutors in making a charging decision. Such requests, according to the McNulty Memorandum, are to be sought only in "rare circumstances." Although prosecutors may "favorably consider" a company's compliance with a Category II request in determining whether the company has cooperated with the government's investigation, they are prohibited from considering a refusal to comply with a Category II request.

With respect to fees, the McNulty Memorandum states that "[p]rosecutors generally should not take into account whether a corporation is advancing attorneys' fees to employees or agents under investigation and indictment." However, in a footnote, the McNulty Memorandum states that in "extremely rare cases" the advancement of attorneys' fees "may be taken into account when the totality of the circumstances show that it was intended to impede a criminal investigation." The Deputy Attorney General must approve any request to consider such a circumstance in a charging decision.

Considerations for the Future

Whether the McNulty Memorandum in fact reduces the pressure on companies to waive privilege in order to benefit from cooperation remains to be seen. Despite acknowledging the importance of attorney-client and work product protections, DOJ has nonetheless reserved the right to penalize companies that decline to produce the broadly defined Category I information, while rewarding those companies that voluntarily produce information under Category I or II. Similarly, just what constitutes "rare circumstances" that allow prosecutors to take into account advancement of attorneys' fees to employees presently is unknown.

Although it is clearly too early to gauge the impact of the McNulty Memorandum, several observations may be made.

First, the reality is that in corporate investigations in recent years, the government has almost always limited its waiver requests to Category I materials, such as the results of internal investigations, ordinarily steering clear of requests for "pure" attorney-client communications. The major exceptions to this practice have been: (1) in cases involving a potential defense of reliance on counsel, the contents of contemporaneous legal advice; and (2) in cases involving possible obstruction of the government's investigation, the contents of any communications exempted from attorney-client protection by the crime-fraud exception. But these two particular circumstances, in any event, are specifically exempted from the more onerous approval requirements of Category II, and instead need only be approved by the U.S. Attorney. Thus, the only technical change in practice may be the more onerous approval requirements.

JANUARY 2007

Second, although the new policy may not effect a sea change in practice, its restrictions on the unfettered ability of line prosecutors to make ill-considered, reflexive requests for privilege waiver may embolden corporate defense attorneys to be more aggressive than in the recent past in defending corporations in criminal investigations. To be sure, the mere prospect of an indictment remains devastating to most corporations, and the standards for corporate criminal liability continue to be minimal. However, there is likely to be a psychological effect and cultural change in the way that white collar prosecutors and defense lawyers interact, which may well serve to shift the relative bargaining power of the two sides. At a minimum, defense attorneys should now resist the temptation to offer automatically a waiver of privilege at the outset of an investigation, and should instead consider whether such waiver should be delayed until more facts come to light, or withheld altogether.

Third, it remains to be seen whether the change in policy will have any effect on the proliferation in recent years of deferred prosecution and non-prosecution agreements. The Thompson Memorandum, which for the first time explicitly authorized the possibility of deferred prosecution of corporations (under its official name, “pretrial diversion”), sharply increased the number of such agreements, a trend that has imposed extraordinarily burdensome requirements on many companies.<sup>7</sup> In the nearly four years since the Thompson Memorandum was promulgated in 2003, Justice Department prosecutors have entered into at least 33 deferred-and non-prosecution agreements, as compared to merely a dozen in the previous nine years.<sup>8</sup> The McNulty Memorandum pointedly does not alter any reference to deferred prosecution agreements, and even creates a heading titled: “Qualifying for Immunity, Amnesty or Pretrial Diversion” in the section discussing the value of cooperation. This ensures that the government’s appetite for these agreements is unlikely to wane.

Finally, objecting that the McNulty Memorandum does not go far enough, ACC and others have already gone on record protesting the new policy and urging the Senate to act on more stringent legislation.<sup>9</sup> Whether the Senate will take up the issue now that the Justice Department has acted is unknown, but it is likely that DOJ believes that revising its policy the way it did will be sufficient to stave off legislative action. The government may well be right for another reason — legislation controlling the exercise of prosecutorial discretion is extremely rare outside the sentencing context, and Congress may well wish to tread lightly in an area that implicates the separation of powers.

---

<sup>7</sup> See generally Daniel R. Alonso, Use Caution in Negotiating Deferred Prosecution Agreements, 235 N.Y.L.J. 4 (Mar. 1, 2006).

<sup>8</sup> Brandon L. Garrett, Structural Reform Prosecution, 93 VA. L. REV. (forthcoming June 2007), Appendix A.

<sup>9</sup> See Ass’n of Corporate Counsel, What Does the DOJ’s Issuance of the “McNulty Memorandum” Mean for You and Your Client (Dec. 13, 2006), available at <http://acc.com/public/attyclientpriv/mcnulty-tp.pdf>.

PRACTICE GROUP CONTACTS

Daniel R. Alonso
New York
212.836.7025
dalonso@kayescholer.com

William Hoffman
Washington, DC
202.682.3550
whoffman@kayescholer.com

Michael A. Rogoff
New York
212.836.7684
mrogoff@kayescholer.com

Paul J. Curran
New York
212.836.8478
pcurran@kayescholer.com

Jane W. Parver
New York
212.836.8510
jparver@kayescholer.com

Gregory J. Wallance
New York
212.836.8878
gwallance@kayescholer.com

Jeffrey S. Gordon
Los Angeles
310.788.1030
jgordon@kayescholer.com